New prescription drugs had as part of the labeling enclosed with each package a brochure, which the FDA had to approve, describing the therapeutic indications for the drug's use, informing about the proper dosage patterns, and also providing warnings and contraindications. But, since the drug went from the manufacturer to the pharmacist, many doctors did not see this brochure as a matter of course. A few companies mailed copies to physicians, but many did not. They did send, however, lavishly printed literature stressing the drug's merits but playing down, or omitting altogether, commentary on the risks.
